

FRONTEND

The Online Flight Booking Management System (OFBMS) appears to be built using traditional web technologies, with a focus on server-side processing using PHP and MySQL. On the client side, the system likely relies on standard web technologies to deliver a functional and interactive user experience. The frontend is probably constructed with HTML5 for structuring the web pages, including forms for flight searches, user registrations, and payment processing. CSS3 would have been used to style the interface, ensuring a visually appealing layout that is responsive across different devices. JavaScript plays a crucial role in enhancing user interactions, enabling dynamic features such as form validation, real-time seat selection, and flight filtering without requiring full page reloads.

Given the PHP-based backend, jQuery was likely incorporated to simplify AJAX requests, DOM manipulation, and event handling. This would allow for seamless updates to flight availability, pricing, and booking confirmations without refreshing the page. Additionally, Bootstrap may have been used to streamline the design process, providing a responsive grid system and pre-built UI components like navigation bars, modals, and form elements. For date and time selection in flight searches, a JavaScript datepicker library (such as jQuery UI Datepicker) was probably implemented to improve usability.

Security measures on the client side would include form validations for user inputs, such as checking email formats, password strength, and credit card details before submission. While the primary security (like password hashing) is handled server-side, the frontend likely provides immediate feedback to users to prevent invalid submissions. The system is designed to be compatible with modern web browsers, ensuring accessibility for most users while maintaining functionality across different platforms. Overall, the client-side technologies work in tandem with the PHP backend to deliver a smooth and efficient flight booking experience.
